Philosophers speak or rather they respond to various forms of speaking that are handed to them. This book by one of our most distinguished philosophers focuses on the communicative aspect of philosophical thought. Peperzak's central focus is addressing what distinguishes speaking or writing from rumination: is their being directed by someone to someone to be involved in philosophy is to be part of a tradition through which thinkers propose their findings to others who respond by offering their own appropriations to their interlocutors. After a critical sketch of the conception of modern philosophy, Peperzak presents a succinct analysis of speaking, insisting on the radical distinction between speaking about and speaking to. He enlarges this analysis to history and tries to answer the question whether philosophy also implies a certain form of listening and responding to words of God. Since philosophical speech about persons can neither honor nor reveal their full truth, speaking and thinking about God is even more problematic. Meditation about the archaic word cannot reach the speaker unless it turns into prayer or, as Descartes wrote, into a contemplation that makes the thinker consider, admire, and adore the beauty of God's immense light as much as the eyesight of my blinded mind can tolerate. Thinking is a work of genuine and original scholarship which responds to the tradition of philosophical thinking with a critique of its language style, focus, and scope.
